

Excerpt: ...Hes not satisfied with handing her to any kind of man. If the choice is to be among Radicals and infidels, I dont wonder. He has come to one of the tests. Cecilia heard Beauchamp speaking of a newspaper. A great Radical Journal, unmatched in sincerity, superior in ability, soon to be equal in power, to the leader and exemplar of the lucre-Press, would some day see the light. Youll want money for that, said Tuckham. I know, said Beauchamp. Are you prepared to stand forty or fifty thousand a year? It need not be half so much., Counting the libels, I rate the outlay rather low. Yes, lawyers, judges, and juries of tradesmen, dealing justice to a Radical print! Tuckham brushed his hand over his mouth and ahemed. Its to be a penny journal? Yes, a penny. Id make it a farthing- Pay to have it read? Willingly. Tuckham did some mental arithmetic, quaintly, with rapidly blinking eyelids and open mouth. You may count it at the cost of two paying mines, he said firmly. That is, if its to be a consistently Radical Journal, at law with everybody all round the year. And by the time it has won a reputation, it will be undermined by a radicaler Radical Journal. Thats how weve lowered the country to this level. Thats an Inferno of Circles, down to the ultimate mire. And what on earth are you contending for? Freedom of thought, for one thing. We have quite enough free-thinking. Theres not enough if theres not perfect freedom. Dangerous! quoth Mr. Austin. But its that danger which makes men, sir; and its fear of the danger that makes our modern Englishman. Oh! Oh! cried Tuckham in the voice of a Parliamentary Opposition. Well, you start your paper, well assume it: what class of men will you get to write? I shall get good men for the hire. You wont get the best men; you may catch a clever youngster or two, and an old rogue of talent; you wont get men of weight. Theyre prejudiced, I dare say. The Journals...
