

Its own light and composing from them, as from elements, other thoughts, each containing within itself the principle of its own integrity. The one is the synthetic, or the principle of synthesis, and has for its object those forms which are common to universal nature and existence itself; the other is the analytic, or principle of analysis and its action regards the relations of things simply as relations; considering thoughts, not in their integral unity, but as the algebraical representations which conduct to certain general results. Reason is the enumeration of quantities already known; imagination is the perception of the value of those quantities, both separately and as a whole. Reason respects the differences, and imagination the similitudes of things. Reason is to imagination as the instrument to the agent, as the body to the spirit, as the shadow to the substance. Poetry, in a general sense, may be defined to be the expression of the imagination: and poetry is connate with it. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and don't occur in the book.)
