

Kit Reed writes fresh, exciting stories ripped straight out of tomorrows headlines. A boy raised by wolves, the dog that knows exactly who is next to die, a monkey that writes bestsellers-- no, Kit Reeds new collection is by no means the next Animal Planet. What Wolves Know also contains Doing the Butterfly, in which a convict with murder in his heart sets out to deceive the newest Magnetic Resonance Imaging machine, and the sparkling story Special, about a nature writer named Ashley Famous, who overturns local society in a small town on the Hudson. In The Chaise, a university community stands by while the narrator grapples with a despicable piece of furniture, and baffled parents in Denny arm themselves, fearing that their son, the title character, may go all Columbine on us. Sharp, often funny, Reeds stories have been called, variously, pure dry ice and less fantastic than visionary by The New York Times Book Review, which describes one of the stories in her collection, Thief of Lives as a masterpiece of its kind. In his Afterword: What She Thought She Was Doing, Joseph Reed of Wesleyan University analyzes her work, excerpting reviews from distinguished critics in both the U.S. and the U.K.
